mint had taken zeke back to his room. mint was sitting on the edge of the bed, while zeke laid on the other side of it. as far as mint knew, he was asleep.

mint kept thinking back to what zeke had said earlier in the showers. he loved zeke, of course he did, but.. he wasn't expecting zeke to say that. zeke was in love with him, but couldn't even realize. if only they weren't in this godforsaken killing game, if only mint wasn't such a horrible person. then maybe they could be happy. maybe they could be together.

he looked behind him. at zeke. the princess.

he looked around at zeke's room. it was messy and careless, but still had a sense of organization and purpose to it. just like zeke.

god, he really was in love with him. all he could hope was that zeke wouldn't remember this by morning and mint could forget that this ever happened.

mint felt zeke stir beside him, barely awake.

".. mint?"

"hm?", mint asked. zeke turned over to him with tired eyes. he was still drunk from earlier, but the exhaustion had hit him like a truck not too long ago. he mumbled something that mint couldn't understand. when mint looked at him with confusion, he made a face similar to a pout and spoke a bit louder.

"c'mere," zeke said, slurring his words. he shuffled closer to mints figure, basically hugging his waist as well as he could with mint sitting on the side of the bed.

mint's face flushed, but he went along with it anyways, now really hoping that zeke wouldn't remember this by the time he woke up. he brought his legs onto the bed and leaned against the headboard. zeke curled into him even further.

he was wrong, mint realized. there was another thing mint could hope for other than zeke not remembering all of what happened tonight the next day. he could hope that maybe, in some way, he and zeke could still be happy together here.
